those under 14 were half price. The next day 13 June the saints continued to St. Louis where some of them remained until the next season. The rest soon afterwards reached the general place of encampment for the emigrants near Kansas city. This large family was reunited with William's father, John Fenn, in St. Louis, the latter part of June. What a joyous reunion this must have been. This hospitable patriarch now 78 years of age was gladdened to have more of his family near.

Rest, and a proper diet would be a normal desire after such a long and tedious journey with such a large family as William Fenn had, however they could not have been in St. Louis but a very few days when it became a daily sorrowful duty to bury one of their little ones, Emma age 7 died 2 July 1854. Ezra, age 4 died 3 July 1854, Caleb Fenn age 10 died 4 July 1854. Mariah Fenn also died in St. Louis. She was two months old daughter of Charles and Ann Fountaine Fenn and sister to Ezra Fenn. Mariah died 14 Dec 1855. Also Jane Andres Fenn, Hodgert and family and whos baby was born on the water enroute, Robert Alexander Hodgert. This baby also died in St. Louis when he was 5 weeks three days old on 25 April 1852 with what was called white mouth.

Of the 6,000 saints who died along the trail to Salt Lake City, William Fenn's family paid a heavy toll. Typhoid fever, Cholera, measles and many other diseases were common enemies in this period and especially in this area. This was still only the beginning of this families sorrows here in America. Sarah Reeves, beloved wife of William Fenn, and mother of the late Emma and Caleb departed this life 12 Dec. 1854 to join those little ones so recently laid away.

President Brigham Young was concerned and was endeavoring to avoid the mounting death toll of the saints as is evidenced by a letter written on 2 April 1854 to Franklin D. Richards. "You are aware of the sickness liable to assail our unacclimated brethern on the Mississippi River, hence, I wish you to ship no more to New Orleans but ship to Philadelphia, Boston and New York, giving preference in the order named.... in case any should still choose to ship by New Orleans ship them from England no later than about 1 December that they may be able to get off the rivers before the sickly season sets in, for many have died off the rivers before with Cholera and other diseases incident to the sickly
